

Vaguely Sharp Sales Deck

New formats. New channels. New algorithms. New creators. New tools.

Brands have always had to adapt to culture, but the pace of adaptation has changed.

Brands are making more content than ever.
But it is harder to know what is worth repeating.

.

Brand engagement has been on a steady decline.

Average Instagram brand engagement has fallen sharply since 2020.

The issue is not that audiences stopped paying attention.
They became more selective about what deserves it.

The pressure shows up differently from brand to brand.

- Sometimes the audience is there, but it is not moving.
- Sometimes the team is moving, but the audience is not.
- Sometimes the brand is stronger than its social presence.
- Sometimes something works once — and no one knows whether it was a signal or an accident.

Different symptoms.
Same underlying question.

We kept seeing the same response.

When attention gets harder to earn,
brands make more.

More posts.

More creators.

More formats.

More production pressure.

But more content does not answer
the question we kept coming back to:

What is worth repeating?

We started testing that question in the work itself.

The strongest content is not just better produced.

It has a repeatable engine underneath it.

A reason people recognize it.

A reason they return to it.

A reason it can become more than one post, one campaign, or one moment.

That is where Vaguely Sharp focuses.

We help brands identify, develop, and produce the creative formats worth building around.

LIDs x Frosty Preme:

A product drop became a cultural moment.

Frosty Preme partnered with LIDs to release four original fitted hat designs.

Vaguely Sharp produced the campaign assets around the drop:

2 Instagram reels

20 photo deliverables

All four designs sold out within two hours.

The campaign also gave the drop a visual world that could move across both Frosty's audience and LIDs' brand platform.

What it showed us:

When the product, community, and creative voice are already aligned, content does not have to manufacture attention from scratch.

It can activate the demand already sitting inside the audience.

Key signals:

4 designs sold out in 2 hours

Reel #1: ~57.7K views

Reel #2: ~44.1K views

2 photo carousels: 1,066 likes / 825 likes

Layton Lamell

Rebuilding a creator brand around stronger audience signals.

Layton came to Vaguely Sharp after a period of declining engagement and growing frustration with the content he was making.

He did not want to keep producing influencer content that no longer felt aligned with where his brand was going. We began working across his branded and organic social content to help redefine the creative direction around a stronger audience fit.

The work focused on identifying what his audience actually responded to:

Immediate narrative tension

Real-world grounding

Genuine Layton character

Cinematic quality without losing authenticity

The Puma reel became the clearest proof of concept.

It was simple, grounded, character-driven, and built around the signals we had identified.

What it showed us:

A creator or brand does not always need a bigger content calendar.

Sometimes the opportunity is to rebuild the creative system around the audience they are trying to grow into.

Key signals:

Puma reel: 56.6K views

4,889 likes

84 comments

Strongest Vaguely Sharp proof of concept on Layton's page

Deconstructed with Frosty Preme

Building an original content engine from the ground up.

After the LIDs campaign, Vaguely Sharp partnered again with Frosty Preme to develop an original social-native series around the fitted hat community.

The idea: go behind the scenes with NYC fitted hat designers, artists, collectors, drops, and the culture surrounding the work.

No brand financing.

No existing platform.

Just a clear community, a strong creative lead, and a format worth building.

We produced a pilot episode with Peanut Butter Justin and began developing the series as a larger content system:

Long-form episodes

Short-form trailers

Social clips

Event recaps

Man-on-the-street interviews

Community-driven distribution

What it showed us:

A strong format can become more than a single piece of content.

It can become an ecosystem: episodes, clips, events, characters, community, and repeatable audience behavior.

Key signals:

Pilot episode produced

15+ episode target for first season

2 cultural events captured

50–70 supplemental social reels in development

Instagram grew to 85 followers before posting

The same pattern kept showing up: the strongest content was not just better produced. It had a repeatable engine underneath it.

The Pilot

We usually start with a short content format pilot.

A focused engagement designed to pressure-test what your brand should build around before investing in a larger campaign or content program.

The pilot helps answer:

What is already earning attention?

Where is the strongest creative opportunity?

Which formats are worth testing?

What should become a campaign, series, or ongoing content engine?

Next step: decide whether a paid pilot is worth scoping.

In a follow-up conversation, we'll review your current priorities, audience signals, and production needs to determine whether a focused creative development pilot makes sense.

If there's a fit, we'll outline the scope, timeline, and investment required.

Next step: scope the right starting engagement.

In a follow-up conversation, we'll review your current priorities, audience signals, and production needs to determine whether a focused creative development pilot makes sense.

If there's a fit, we'll outline the scope, timeline, and investment required.

Vaguely Sharp

Creative strategy, development, and production for social-native campaigns.

Eric Krehbiel

Founder / Owner

eric@vaguelysharp.com

(919) 695-2906